There's nothing inherent about racism -- it's a social construct that we learn collectively. The experiences of Sikh Americans illustrates this point well. While they have a unique visible appearance, few Americans actually know who they are. Come learn about the Sikh religion, their experiences with racialization in America, and what this tells us about how we think about race in America today.